

I've been in high school for four years, this being my fourth and I learned a lot. For example loyalty, it changes over the years in high school rather you and the person started off really close and now are sort of distant or are just not friends at all. I learned honestly school is not about making friends, and it took me up until now realize that because the drama arguing and fighting will not help you graduate what will help you is respect.

Respect is something I use to not take very seriously not that I wasn't raised or brought up right just that I didn't care enough I was too worried about what was going on around me and worrying about people respecting me instead of me respecting others. However there are two teachers I have grown to respect and that would be Spencer and Izzo. They helped me a lot without even realizing those are teachers you can tell take passion in their students and work and know how to have fun with it, I have no choice but to respect that.

Last but not least is focus something I finally overcame. Learning to do whatever I do it or not knowing that I can is a awesome goal, for the fact teachers and such think I seem to have A.D.D I know I can prove them wrong in fact I have so with all that being said I learned a lot throughout high school and I've accomplished all my short term goals. now just to accomplish my long term goals such as going off to hair dressing school and eventually owning my own salon and I'll be on my way.
